

Beth A. Siekiera. Electronic Government Publications and Definitions in State Legislation. A Master's Paper for the M.S. in L.S degree. July, 2008. 73 pages. Advisor: Deborah Barreau

State governments have shifted their publication practices from producing mainly print-only formats to creating electronic publications. In 2003, the American Association of Law Libraries conducted a survey that indicated that few states were collecting and preserving these electronic documents. It also showed that few state laws reflected the change in publication formats. The purpose of this study is to examine the language used in state law regarding electronic government publications as of 2008. The results show that most states have a broad definition that does not mention electronic formats, but includes them by interpretation. Further studies regarding the relationship between these laws and collection, compliance from state agencies, and funding are suggested.

Introduction

"A popular government without popular information, or the means of acquiring it, is but a prologue to a farce or a tragedy; or, perhaps both. Knowledge will forever govern ignorance; and a people who mean to be their own governors, must arm themselves with the power which knowledge gives."

James Madison, 1822³

The federal and state governments today publish and distribute an unprecedented amount of government information on the internet. (Lin & Eschenfelder, 2008)

Originally, government information was published entirely in print format. Libraries and archives collected the published documents and preserved them for future generations.

This system worked fairly well until the introduction of alternative formats to print. In the 1970s microprint formats began to be distributed. In the 1980s, advances in technology led the government to rely on the computer to store information. By the 1990s, it became clear that printed formats would no longer be the standard format for government publications and by 2008, the majority of new government publications are produced in an electronic format.

The shift from print to electronic has provided a challenge for depository libraries and archives that collect and preserve government information. With printed documents, the process of preserving a document is fairly straightforward. Electronic documents, however, are a bit more complicated. There are questions about authenticity, integrity and the longevity of the original format. Although electronic documents can be easily copied, there could be loss of data, or the document could be manipulated.

When the federal government needed to implement an electronic records management program for federal government documents, part of the process involved changing the laws to become more inclusive of electronic formats. Although state governments were experiencing many of the same obstacles as the federal government, each state has had to take its own approach to the problem, since each state is its own entity. The transition to electronic documents has not been smooth, and each state has suffered its own problems. The American Association of Law Libraries conducted a survey in 2003 that assessed the progress each state was making in dealing with electronic records. In this study, it was concluded that very few states had any type of digital preservation or electronic records management program.

Public Records vs. Government Publications

There is an important distinction that needs to be made between public records and government publications. Public records generally involve recorded transactions between citizens and the government, and often include personal information. Government publications are produced by the government to inform the public about what an agency has been doing, such as an annual report, an annual budget, or statistics. For example, a report issued by a state agency listing census statistics is considered a publication, while the actual names and addresses of the people surveyed are considered public records. Often in the language of the law, public records and government publications are used interchangeably, although the ideas are separate. However, the purpose of this study is to focus on government publications specifically.

Citizens have a right to access government publications because it allows them to keep government agencies accountable. While public records may also be available to citizens, these records bring their own set of complications. Any record that involves sensitive information requires an additional level of security to prevent undesired effects such as fraud and identity theft. As a result, public records are often not distributed the same way that government publications are. To avoid any confusion between public records and government publications in this paper, but to still capture the language of many of the laws, government produced information and records are referred to as government records.

Background

Each state in the U.S. is an individual when it comes to its history and government. As such, it is challenging to examine the history of electronic government records in state government, because each state would require its own study. There is, however, a way to view this issue broadly; by learning the history of electronic records and the move towards “e-government” in the federal government.

The Government Printing Office (GPO) was created in 1860 to centralize government agency publishing, and by the 1900s had established the Federal Depository Library System (FDLP). (AALL, p. 7) The GPO distributed documents to the FDLP, who would then store, provide access and preserve the documents. (Lyons, 2006) Title 44 of the United States Code was written to require the GPO to provide permanent public access to documents in the FDLP.

The early use of technology by the government was intended to improve the efficiency and productivity of government processes. (Yildiz, 2007) The first effort by the federal government to collect non-traditional formats was in 1939 when punch cards were collected by the National Archives. In the 1960s the first electronic formats were collected when the National Archives acquired and tried to preserve tapes from the Census Bureau. The National Archives continued to build its expertise in collecting government information in all formats in the 1970s (Lyons, 2006) when there was the first awareness of the need to preserve alternative formats. (Singer, 2003) By the 1980s, technology was being developed for the purpose of simplifying government processes, and eventually began to create information in electronic format instead of merely organizing it. For this reason, Title 44 was altered in 1982 to update the definition of government information to include electronic formats. (Singer, 2003)

By the 1990s, there was a huge shift towards using the internet as a means to make government information more easily accessible to the public. As the use of computers and the internet increased in the government, the concept of "e-government" emerged. The term e-government can be defined in a variety of different ways. Depending on the purpose of the initiative, e-government can refer to the use of technology in government applications, the use of the internet to deliver government information and services, or the application of an all-electronic system by a government agency. (Yildiz, 2007) Regardless of the specific definition in use, the main purpose of any e-government initiative is to “make government work better, faster, more convenient to use for its stakeholders and provide administrative and democratic channels that were not possible to open with the old technological tools.” (Yildiz, 2007) E-government also always has another universal characteristic regardless of the definition; the creation of electronic records.

In 1993 the Government Printing Office Electronic Information Access Enhancement Act (Pub. L. No. 103-40, 107 Stat.112) became law. This law directed the

GPO to create a directory of electronic federal government information, and to archive electronic information and provide access to it. (Singer, 2003) At the federal level, the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) and the Government Printing Office (GPO) are responsible for most of the digital preservation efforts that take place at the federal level. NARA created the Electronic Records Archive (ERA) in 1998. Meant to handle electronic records, the ERA is expected to develop a program that will serve as a long-term storage and preservation system for federal digital information. (Lyons, 2006) Preservation is a problem because of the need to ensure data integrity, avoid hardware and software obsolescence, and to keep up with the volume of information being produced continually. (Lyons, 2006)

Spurred on by laws such as the 1995 Paperwork Reduction Act (Pub. L. No. 104-13, 109 Stat. 163), the Electronic Freedom of Information Act Amendments of 1996, and the 2001 E-Government Act (Pub. L. No. 107-347, 116 Stat. 2899), government information has increasingly shifted towards electronic publication and distribution. By the new millennium, more than 50% of the documents distributed through the FDLDP were electronic. By 2005, 90% of newly published titles were electronic. (Staley, 2007) Meanwhile, demand for printed documents has decreased, and downloads of electronic government information have increased. An overwhelming number of Americans have access to the internet, and many use the internet to access government information. Many people, especially the younger generations, expect to find government information online. (Staley, 2007)“Americans search government Web sites looking for a variety of information or E-Government services, including tourist information, health and safety information, statistics, government forms or opportunities to do business with government.” (AALL report, p. 2) Users, in general, appreciate electronic access because it is quick and convenient. This is supported by the number of downloads from government websites, as well as anecdotal evidence from library users. (Rawan, Malone, & Bender, 2004)

The wide availability of electronic documents has caused many depository libraries to substitute their print collections with electronic formats. Other libraries have decided to leave the depository program based on the belief that the wide availability of electronic documents decreases the need for individual libraries to collect these documents. (Rawan et al., 2004) This is a false assumption; for while there is greater access, there is still a need for individual libraries to preserve this information. There is also a need for librarians to assist patrons finding this information and to help them understand how to use it.

Literature Review

In 2002, the American Association of Law Libraries (referred to hereafter as AALL) conducted a survey of the 50 states, as well as the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico, to determine what the current climate was on creating permanent public access to electronic government information. The report, which was published in 2003, has been cited by numerous articles regarding digital preservation, electronic government publications, and library legislation, and is the most thorough study of the subject to date. The weight of the study comes from the results; the study discovered that few states have implemented the kinds of changes necessary to support the collection and preservation of electronic government records. The key concepts from the AALL survey are the need for comprehensive legislation to protect electronic government records, the need to provide permanent public access to government information, the importance of identifying the entities responsible for publishing, distributing, collecting and preserving electronic information, and the need to advocate to state policymakers and lawmakers for the desired legislative changes.

Martin, Chamberlin and Dmitrieva reviewed state laws in 2001 to determine how many states required the publication and distribution of government information via the internet. (Martin, Chamberlin, & Dmitrieva, 2001) Amazingly, the authors found that 41 states required some level of web posting for government information. (Martin et al., 2001) Electronic publishing seems to be preferred by the government because it saves time and money. (Martin et al., 2001)(Lin & Eschenfelder, 2008)(Spurlin, 2005) Given the usage of the internet to present government information to the public, it seems logical that electronic information would be required to be collected and preserved in the same way that printed publications are collected by depository libraries.

Electronic publishing also provides faster and more convenient access for citizens, who seem to prefer electronic access to government information over the traditional print forms. Journalists and researchers especially use electronic government information as their go-to sources (Bunker, 1996), since “government-created electronic documents are considered to be the most reliable”. (Spurlin, 2005)

Implications of Electronic Formats

In 1989, a lawsuit was filed to prevent the destruction of electronic data created and stored in the Professional Office System (PROFS) used by the Reagan Administration. While the center of the litigation related to controversial political actions, the surrounding arguments highlighted an issue that had not previously been encountered. The PROFS litigation brought into focus the fact “that electronic records are not identical to analog copies and they must be preserved in electronic form.” In particular, an argument was made that it would be too difficult to save electronic records, so the records should be printed out and preserved as print materials. The difficulty with this idea lay in the fact that much of the surrounding metadata associated with the records (many of which were emails) was not available in the printed out versions. The metadata from the records provided important information about who, what and when, and could not be duplicated in print format. (Lyons, 2006)

Similar difficulties have been encountered in court cases in several states. Using the Freedom of Information Act, many journalists in the late 1980s and early 1990s who attempted to access government information were provided with information on different media than the originals. State governments often claimed that this was due to the burden of the cost of providing access to electronic records, and that printed or microfilm records were similar. Yet there is a significant difference between electronic records and printed records, especially when dealing with large data sets as journalists often do. Electronic records are much faster and easier for journalists to use, and help save them time. (Bunker, 1996)

Electronic publications are different from their print counterparts because of their digital nature. This means that in order to access the data in electronic files they must rely on hardware and software to run. And in some instances the hardware or software can fail, or become obsolete. For example, WordPerfect was at one time a widely-used word processing program, but in 2008 it is difficult to open a WordPerfect document because Microsoft Word has become the more widely used software program. While it is possible to open the WordPerfect file in Word, some of the formatting is lost. But imagine if that instead of merely losing a small bit of formatting, an agency report loses a paragraph or the numbers in a chart change. It could have implications in the future for anyone desiring to access that information.

Permanent Access

Historians and researchers know the importance of preserving electronic government records, because just like their printed counterparts, electronic publications hold information that is an integral part of the nation's history. (Spurlin, 2005) Access to government publications helps keep government officials accountable to citizens, and unless these documents are saved, valuable information will be lost. (Spurlin, 2005) When redesigning the New York State depository system, the New York State Library wanted to make sure that state government publications were easily accessible to both staff and the public. (Burton, 1992) Libraries are committed to providing information to patrons; libraries that are repositories for government documents have an even greater responsibility to the patrons, because as tax-payers members of the public have a right to access government information. (AALL, p. 2)

Role of Librarians

Another issue is that the education of government information librarians will need to change as well. Because of the growing trend in Web publishing and distribution, the role of government information librarians will change. (Lin & Eschenfelder, 2008) Librarians will need to become more proactive in their roles of collecting and preserving electronic government information, which will require new skills. Training will become much more important for librarians to ensure that they can continue to provide access to patrons. Government information librarians must be highly trained because they deal with a range of questions and need to know where to locate specific information.(Block, 2003)

Now that the majority of government publications are available on the internet, many users will not need to visit a library or archives to view the information they seek. To meet the needs of these online patrons, government information librarians will need to have a variety of technology-based skills, which may include internet applications and web site design, thorough knowledge of electronic resources of every variety, and knowledge of creating and executing search strategies.(Staley, 2007) Clearer, more comprehensive legislation will aide librarians in their responsibilities, and will provide useful guidance as their roles adjust to accommodate the shift to electronic information.

The Need to Change the Law

Many state legislators are relying on guidelines and “best practices” when it comes to collecting and preserving electronic information (Spurlin, 2005); however without legislation that is more specific about its definitions many publications will be lost forever. If electronic formats continue to be favored for government records, then the existing legislation will quickly become outdated to the point where it will not apply in the way it was originally intended. Electronic and print formats are not equivalent; which means that legislation that was drafted with print publications in mind cannot possibly provide for the special circumstances created by electronic publications. And now that electronic documents comprise the majority of newly published government documents, the law needs to change to support their unique qualities. For example, it may be necessary to require certain metadata formats to identify government publications, or that publications be created in special preservation-friendly formats.

In order to enhance the public's access to state publications, the South Dakota Legislature has changed the South Dakota statutes over the years. Unfortunately, the statutes have not been changed recently enough to include electronic formats. (Spurlin, 2005) Yet because of South Dakota's program to provide permanent preservation of electronic government documents, there is a need to revise the statutes to ensure that the State Government is in full support of that program.

Tracking Government Information

Electronic documents are easy to create and publish on the internet, and they also reduce the need for the government to use formal publishing methods for its documents. Unfortunately, without formal methods, often self-published government documents are not announced when they are created or posted, which makes them more difficult to locate. Electronic government records can be located in many different places; they can be scattered across a number of servers around the state, on different computers in an agency, or posted on different web pages on the agency website. (Spurlin, 2005) Some agencies also post their information outside of the dot-gov domain, which reduces the likelihood of these publications ever being found. (Lin & Eschenfelder, 2008) Clear legislation is not only important for permanent access, but also for "successful bibliographic control of state agency publications". (Langelier, 1989) With more a specific definition of what constitutes a government record, librarians will be better able to identify and collect these publications without needing to worry about the format.

The ease of self-publishing also means that a greater amount of information can be published than was possible with paper printing. The more documents that are produced online, the harder it is to ensure that all of those documents are being collected, especially if they are not distributed to libraries. Documents that are not announced or distributed properly are often referred to as “fugitive documents”. (Block, 2003) These documents are at the highest risk of being missed by libraries and disappearing completely. Electronic documents increase the amount of fugitive documents, because of the increase in possibility for technical problems such as broken URLs and obsolescence of format. They can also cause a headache for anyone trying to locate the information in these publications.

To address problems locating newly published documents, the state of Colorado adjusted its legislation in 2003 to mandate that state agencies notify the depository program within ten days of publishing a document. (Spurlin, 2005) South Dakota has also worked hard to collect its government publications, and created a “one-stop database” for its citizens so that it is not necessary to even know which agency produced the document. (Spurlin, 2005)

Libraries have had to develop new methods for selection in order to collect electronic documents. Unfortunately these methods have their own drawbacks, which affect the resulting quality of the government documents collection. (Lin & Eschenfelder, 2008) Either the collection is too large, with a disproportionate amount of unnecessary information, or the collection is smaller and misses many important publications. Both of these problems are a result of trying to find a solution for collecting electronic government publications without having a clear definition of exactly what is essential to collect.

While many issues surround electronic government publications in order to examine these issues more closely, it is necessary to study smaller parts. Since the language in the definitions of the laws appears to be at the heart of many of the problems expressed above, it seems like a good place to begin. This research is meant to discover exactly what the definitions are in state legislation to determine whether or not electronic publications have been acknowledged.

Research Methods

This study sought to discover whether each state has, in the library or records laws pertaining to government publications, a definition of a government publication or record that includes, either explicitly or implicitly, electronic formats. Using the results from this study, it may be possible in the future to study additional areas related to electronic state government publications, such as addressing access issues and improving depository library collection policies.

To collect the data for this study, the list of laws from each state was compiled by visiting the government website of 49 states in the United States. Hawaii was not included in the findings, due to technical problems experienced on the Hawaii state website. First, the area of the website that contained the laws, statutes, or code of the state was located. Next, informed browsing led the areas that dealt specifically with collecting government records. The most common location of this information was in the laws that dealt with libraries or records, though in some instances those laws were in the laws relating to the organization and administration of the state government. These laws were generally located in statutes that deal with libraries, archives and history, or under the education statutes. Another common location of records laws is under the general administrative statutes that deal with state government. Certain words in the statutes indicated whether relevant laws would be located in that particular statute. Some of the key terms included: state library, archives, government records, public records, agency publications, and depository program. These laws were either depository library laws, library laws, or records laws. To help verify this information, the websites of the state library or archives were consulted, as they often list the relevant laws that pertain to their state depository collections. In instances where there were relevant definitions in two areas of the legislation, the definition referred to by depository or library section was preferred by the author over a definition in a public records section. The reason for this is mainly because the depository definition most often referred to the target government publications, whereas public records laws usually specifically referred to documentation of transactions between the government and citizens.

The texts of the laws were collected on a wiki, with each state constituting its own page. Each page was tagged according to whether or not the word “electronic” was used explicitly when defining records. Other synonyms and terms were accepted in lieu of the word electronic, such as digital and “machine-readable”. Pages were also tagged for the states in which the law provided an interesting example. The author used these tags to help tally the number of states that used the word electronic, those which could include electronic, and those which did not include it. Although these methods were used for purely organizational purposes for the author, the use of a wiki and tags demonstrates the pervasive nature of technology today.

It should be pointed out that often the version of state legislation posted on government websites carried a disclaimer about the accuracy of the information posted.

The versions available on the web are not considered official, and therefore do not carry the guarantee of accuracy that the printed versions do.

Findings

This study began with the stated purpose of discovering what the specific language is regarding electronic publications in state legislation. In part, this study is also meant to build on the work completed in the AALL survey to see if any progress has been made in the legislation since 2003. The results conclude that all but one state does address, either directly or indirectly, electronic formats in the legislation, but it appears that little progress has been made in the legislation to address electronic formats since the AALL survey.

The table on the following pages lists each state and the specific wording pertaining to the format of government information in each state's law. The third column, titled "Law Type" refers to the section of the law in which the definition was found. This determination was made by using either the title of the particular statute or the text of the entirety of the law in which the definition was found. In this column there are four main categories: library, records, depository, and government. One state, Michigan, had its definition in the Freedom of Information Act. The final column in the table lists the tag that was used to organize and identify which states mentioned electronic formats explicitly, and which states only included electronic formats implicitly.

Sixteen states⁴ have laws that explicitly use the word electronic in the definition of government records. Surprisingly, some of the laws were written to include formats other than print long before electronic formats were an issue. Unfortunately, that means that these laws were designed to include formats like microfilm and computer disks, which do not have the same complexity of the electronic formats that are available today.

Some states, however, have made recent changes to the law. Connecticut, for example, has revised its law as recently as 2007 to ensure that electronic documents are included in the definition of government publications. Other states, such as Kansas, have amended their public records definitions to include electronic formats, but not their government publications definition. Since the stated objective of this study was to focus on government publications, states like Kansas were considered to not recognize electronic formats in legislation.

Thirty-two states⁵ have laws that implicitly include electronic formats in the definition of government records. The most common phrases related to format in the definition was "any format" or "regardless of physical format or characteristics". The definitions in these states are broad enough that electronic formats can be included without having to list the potential formats. In fact, many of the laws used the broad "any format” language in lieu of listing specific formats, and used exemption definitions to exclude publications and formats that are not considered to be government records. Such broad definitions have the potential to cause problems, especially since even the term “electronic” could refer to one of thousands of types of electronic formats that are available today.

It appears also that many states have not been hindered by the lack of a specific definition in the law. The Maryland Digital State Publications Task Force published a report in April 2007 that reviewed the status of their electronic government records. In the report, the task force notes that some of the states that they have contacted⁶ do not have explicit mention of electronic formats in the state laws, but that they have nonetheless created electronic publication initiatives for their state. It does not appear that clearly defined legislation is the key to collecting and preserving government records. Despite this, the Maryland task force still recommends changing the law to be openly inclusive of electronic formats, and reports from other states seem to indicate that changing the definitions in the law is highly desirable.

There are several reasons why it is important to be specific about the definition of what constitutes a government record. First, it is of the utmost importance to ensure that government publications are collected and preserved for future generations. Yet it is a difficult task to select which government publications to collect when legislation provides little to no guidance in the matter. The decision must then be made at the discretion of the collecting institution. But electronic publishing via the internet has created new types of resources that traditionally have not been collected before, such as press releases, directories and web pages. (Lin & Eschenfelder, 2008) Digital publications have a tendency to change or even disappear without any announcement at all, and this is a real challenge to collection. (Dallas & Thornton, 2004)

The lack of a clear definition does not only affect libraries and archives, it touches everyone involved with these publications. The publishing government agencies in particular need to have a clear understanding of what is a government record and what is not, or else it is difficult for them to know what they must distribute. If the laws are too vague, agencies might debate which electronic documents they are required to distribute, and they might even argue about what their exact responsibilities are regarding electronic publications. (Lin & Eschenfelder, 2008) Government agencies do not always have the same access and preservation issues in mind that government information librarians do. In a 2003 article in Library Journal, Carolyn Kohler, government publications librarian at the University of Iowa is quoted as saying, “The agencies do understand that people want the information right now...I’m just not sure they get that people may still want it 20 years from now.” (Block, 2003)

In one state, Idaho, the law does not provide for the possibility of electronic formats in the definition of government records. In a 2006 assessment of state government records, Idaho recognized the need to adjust the state law to reflect the changes in publication methods for government records. (Nancy Bolt & Associates, 2006) Specifically, one of the goals highlighted in the document is to change the law so that it includes electronic formats explicitly. The hope is that changing the definition to be more inclusive will assist in the collection of all government records produced, especially those in electronic format. In turn, this could improve the function of the state depository program, and allow for increased access and organization of government information available to the public. It is worth noting that Idaho is one of the states that, according to the Idaho Commission for Libraries website⁷, has implemented a records program to collect and preserve born-digital government publications.

The Lin article brings up an intriguing question; should legislation, in addition to including electronic formats, also further define and limit the types of electronic formats for government publications? With paper formats, there is no need to be more specific about the variety of paper formats available. But there are countless electronic formats that include not only text, but graphics, audio, video, relational databases and other dynamic elements that cannot ever be equated by printed formats. Consequently, simply adding the word "electronic" to the definition may actually create new problems, because there will inevitably be electronic formats that cannot be supported in the long term. This is a very interesting problem, because it appears that the legislation needs to be not only adjusted to include electronic formats explicitly, but to also expand that legislation to prevent possible complications from the distribution and preservation of electronic publications. Any new legislation might be better served if it is carefully researched to avoid problems with compatibility and preservation. And part of the solution may require the definition to be more specific than merely adding the word "electronic".

It may actually be the case that if the laws don't change now, there will be even larger problems down the road than just whether or not to collect electronic formats. There may be issues with poor program structure, no penalties for non-compliant agencies, and loss of access to important government information. Alternately, the lack of a more rigid definition could result in broad collection policies that would create a serious overload of information. Too much information is just as devastating as too little information, because it could overwhelm depository programs and make it difficult for citizens to find what they are looking for.

Conclusion

The AALL report is extremely ambitious in one aspect; there is an expectation to discover not only if state legislation includes electronic formats, but to see if it also provides for permanent public access to the information. The author of this paper intended only to see if state legislatures have acknowledged the existence of electronic government records in legislation. As noted in the AALL report, more extensive legislation will be necessary to build a framework for permanent public access to electronic records. However, as a famous quote from Confucius says, “A journey of a thousand miles begins with a single step.”

It appears that on a legislative level not much progress has occurred since the AALL survey was published, though it is possible that the number of states involved in an electronic records program has increased given the awareness that the survey created. If indeed this is the case, it may be worth discovering why legislation has not been changed. Perhaps at a sufficiently distant date the AALL will complete an in-depth follow up on its survey to determine whether progress is being made in the area of electronic government records and permanent access, as well as the progress made in addressing new laws.

There is still plenty of room for further study involving legislation and electronic government publications. Two specific areas of study that would be helpful are the implications that laws have on funding for programs that collect and preserve electronic publications, and agency compliance with depositing electronic publications. The first area is important because although electronic publishing saves a government money from publishing and distribution costs, the cost of collecting and preserving long-term access to those same electronic publications might not be proportionate. (Lavoie, 2003)

Therefore some in-depth studies about the costs versus the benefits may be in order. It would also be interesting to see whether or not legislation would allow state depository programs, archives, or other institutions that serve as state publications repositories, to receive more government funding.

Compliance will also continue to be an interesting topic related to electronic government publications, because it is closely intertwined with the ability to provide access. If electronic publications are not being submitted as they should, then they are at risk of being lost forever. As pointed out by Langelier, “[a] successful depository system depends on the full cooperation of state agencies.” (Langelier, 1989) Even at the federal level, compliance from agencies is a big problem. In fact, “fugitive publications”, which are documents published by government agencies that are not sent to depository libraries (Block, 2003), comprise about half of all U.S. government printing. (Staley, 2007) It also brings up the question of what to do when agencies are not cooperating. For example, in Texas agencies are required to post their publications on their website, however there is no specific penalty for agencies that are not complying with the law. And there is no easy way of knowing what the compliance rate is to begin with.

In the past some states have confronted non-compliance by restructuring their depository programs. In 1984, North Carolina conducted a survey of its state government agencies to determine what their publishing practices were. The results of that survey indicated that less than one-fourth of state agency publications were being sent to the State Library, and that only half of the agencies were retaining copies of their printed publications. (Langelier, 1989) New York found a similar problem with its government publications system in 1986. While North Carolina and New York have since redesigned their depository systems, there will likely be the need to be updated to include provisions for electronic publications.

Unfortunately, legislation alone will not solve all of the issues involved with electronic government records. It is merely a component of what needs to be addressed to form a comprehensive solution. Perhaps armed with well-formed legislation, a well-planned depository program, good librarians and archivists, some government funding, and public support, electronic government records will continue to be readily available to all citizens, no matter which state they live in. In the interim, it will be the continued efforts of librarians and archivists that will hopefully fill the void until the governments of each state catch up with the growing issues of the electronic era.
